The oil lamps flickered and one by one The oil lamps flickered and one by one expired. It became darker and darker, and to Lorenz and Mary it seemed that the blackness of death was approaching. "Mary," began the peasant, in a broken voice, for he lacked breath, "Mary, forgive me that I have brought thee to perdition. Our last hour has come. We shall never again look on this world with our sinful eyes. Not for us confession, not for us extreme unction, not for us to lie in our graves, but only to rise from the waters on the last day, my poor one!"

Lorent Toporek and his daughter Mary emigrate to America from Lepiates. Polaud, lured hither by the idea that the United States is an Electrodo Mary loves and it loved by John Smolak, a Polish peasant, who yows to follow her to the world's end.

CHAPTER II.

A STORM AT SEA.

The bow of the ship, where they were flew madly up and down, and, despite the fact that they were holding on to their bunks, they were often thrown against the sides. The roar of the tempest increased and the creaking of the beams and bolts became so frightful that it seemed as though they would part with a great crash.

"Hold tight, Mary!" cried her father, trying to out-voice the storm; but soon a great fear clutched them by the throat. In their terror the children ceased their crying and the women their

She testified that she felt a sympathy for Kennard as for a brother and visited him daily, going home before midnight. Kennard denied the allegations of witnesses for his wife as "all lies." In her testimony, Miss Disbrow said Kennard was sick and needed care. "Our relations were friendly," she said; "entirely sympathetic—that's all." Justice Andrews reserved decision. Miss Westlo

After he had said that he turned his back, and, lifting the end of a rose, cried out, eailor fashion, "To-hoy!" and becan pulling on it.

From that time, whenever he saw Lorens or Mary he smiled at them in a friendly manner. They were very giad that they had found one kindly soul on his German ship, and that their journey would soon be over.

The next morning when they went on deck a strange sight met their eyes. They saw gomething floating on the water, and when they came nearer they saw it was a large, red barrel, rocking gently on the waves; in the distance, reaching out, were a number of others. The sea and air were veiled in a slight mist; they looked mild and silvery, the surface was smooth and still, and as far as the eye could reach more barrels could be observed. Great numbers of sea-guils followed the ship with their cries. There was unusual commotion on deck. The sailors had changed their clothes, some of them washed the deck and others polished the brasswork. They floated one flag at the masthead and

Then in the west could be discerned Sandy Hook. then an island with a building on it; and then, in the distance, something like dense, forlike clouds of amoke stretched on the water, indistinct, far away, mixed, formiese. At this sight a great babel of voices arose; they all pointed with their fingers; the ship whistled shrilly, as if from loy.

"What is that?" inquired Lorens.
"New York," answered Kashub, who was standing near by.

Then the mist and smoke lifted and disappeared, and in the background, as the ship was cutting through the silvery water, could be seen the outlines of houses, roofs and chimneys; the church steeples and high buildings were painted more clearly against the blue. In the lower part of the city could be seen forests of masts, from which floated thousands of vari-colored flags, which swayed in the breeze like flowers upon the mesadow. The ship came nearer and nearer—the beautiful city arose as if from the water.

Lorens, who was filled with astonishment and joy, took off his cap, opened wide his mouth and looked; then he said to his daughter:
"Mary."
"Well?"
"Do you see it?"
"I do."
